

Huron Police Department Launches Voluntary Camera Registry Program to Strengthen Community Safety

The Huron Police Department is introducing a new voluntary Camera Registry Program designed to enhance public safety and support criminal investigations through community partnership.

The program invites residents and business owners throughout Huron to register privately owned surveillance cameras with the department. The registry will help officers identify where cameras may be located in the event of a nearby crime or emergency, allowing investigators to quickly request video that may assist with an active case.

Participation in the program is entirely voluntary. Registering a camera does not provide police with direct access to surveillance systems, live feeds, or recorded footage. Camera owners will retain full control of their systems and will only be contacted if an incident occurs in the area and footage may be relevant to an investigation.

Police officials say the initiative is intended to improve investigative response times and strengthen neighborhood crime prevention efforts.

“This program creates another valuable partnership between law enforcement and the community we serve,” the department said. “By voluntarily registering surveillance cameras, residents and business owners can play an important role in helping deter crime and assist with investigations while maintaining complete control over their personal security systems.”

The Camera Registry Program may assist investigations involving theft, vandalism, suspicious activity, missing people, and other incidents where video evidence could provide important leads.

The department encourages homeowners, businesses, and neighborhood organizations to participate as part of an ongoing commitment to keeping Huron safe.
